For its AIPAD debut, Gallery 1/1 has created a traveling version of their current exhibition, "Illumination: Capturing Light Without a Camera." Among the three artists—all of whom can be described as cameraless photographers—is Ross Sonnenberg, who channels the chaos and frustration of his chronic illness, lupus, by creating explosive images using fireworks.

The resulting photographs, inspired by Hubble Telescope photography, appear to depict otherworldly landscapes, some more singed by the process than others. They are on sale for $800–1,200.

Sonnenberg "is kind of a pyro," the gallery's Dan Shepherd told artnet News. "Each and everyone of them is unique and unreproducible." He was speaking of Sonnenberg's work, but the statement could have applied to the whole booth, and indeed the gallery's entire stock, as it only sells single-edition prints.
